Colloid vitreous detachment following spontaneous drainage of subhyaloidal hemorrhage. Twenty-six eyes with mild traumatic chorioretinal or vitreous hemorrhage, after spontaneous drainage of subhyaloidal hemorrhage of more than 2 months duration, underwent 11-alpha tocopherol and atropine photocoagulation. In 22 cases, the condition was idiopathic and spontaneous healing was complete within 1-6 months; all had residual pigmentary changes. The final visual acuity ranged from 6/6 to 0.5. The final visual acuity in 4 cases, ranging between 6/18 and 6/60, was poor because of macular holes and glaucoma. Colloid vitreous detachment developed within 6-14 months after the onset of hemorrhage, and visual acuity, in these cases, was uniformly good as in the other 20 eyes, despite the presence of persistent pigment. The possibility of chronic decrease in intraocular pressure following spontaneous subhyaloidal hemorrhage, or alternatively, an interferon-like effect, is discussed. Colloid vitreous detachment should not be anticipated as a postoperative complication of spontaneous drainage of subhyaloidal hemorrhage.
